Find out what children think about thinking with Queen's, KFPL

Just like adults, children think about the social world around them — but how can we know what kids think about thinking? How do children form beliefs about other people? How do they reason about what others are thinking? And, how can we encourage children to think more clearly about others?

Dr. Mark Payumo, MSc., from the Psychology Department at Queen's University, is answering those questions and more in the third session of the Growing Up Human series.

“So much of a person's thought process is wired early on in life,” said Jake Miller, Librarian, Adult Programming. “It’s great to have Dr. Payumo explain how this process happens. Learning how children process information and how this informs their daily social relationships is invaluable to anybody interacting with kids.”

The Growing Up Human series, in partnership with Queen's Department of Psychology and the Child and Adolescent Development Research Group, is a monthly series of talks on different aspects of child development.

Join us online for Growing Up Human: What Children Think About Thinking, Mar. 29 from 7-8 p.m. Participants will be sent a Zoom link upon registration. Sign up at <https://calendar.kfpl.ca/event/6071804> or over the phone at 613-549-8888.

Save the date to join KFPL and Dr. Michelle Morningstar on Apr. 21 for part four of Growing Up Human, which focuses on emotional development. Registration opens Mar. 28 at <https://calendar.kfpl.ca/event/6220549>.
